Photo: Eitel Adnan / Group on Earth Observations The Theodora sea, in the Adriatic, is one of the world's oldest and most famous seas, with the Roman Empire once called it Aequicula Caesareae, Caesar's Sea. The Adriatic sea is a deep-bodied plateau-contoured seabed, formed by older Paleozoic and Mesozoic sedimentary rocks, many of which are marine fossils (such as brachiopods) and are up to 200 million years old, formed in the formation of the Adriatic Sea at the time of the opening of the present-day gulf, by the rebound of the boundary between the North Apennine and the Central Apennine. The east European-Adriatic Sea is the only place where some of these marine fossils can be found and has, therefore, been called the "epidary" sea. The sea plate is intersected by some smaller forearc and backarc, generated by the activity of the underlying Alpine orogeny. This is the reason why the sea is quite varied in its appearance and in its current states of rock-type, since it represents the variety of geological conditions. [Listen to an audio version of this article: Download the Audm app for your phone] Physically, the sea is a sedimentary basin that extends from Trieste in the northwest, southward along the coastal zone, in the Posavje basin in northern Croatia and the southernmost part of the Istrian peninsula, a territory of the Republic of Italy. It extends into the interior of Trieste, on the Slovene-Croatia border, and covers the northern part of the Istria peninsula, the Pannonian basin and the narrow eastern part of the Great Hungarian Plain. Its depth varies considerably: the minimum is 3.7 kilometers at its northernmost points. It is about 18.4 kilometers deep at the point of the most extensive submarine canyons, at the south-western edge of the plain of Trieste and in the Gulf of Trieste. This makes
